Dorothy Ruddick remarks at The Cleveland Museum of Art's 1993 exhibition
Small Works in Fiber: The Mildred Constantine Collection

My art education with Josef Albers at Black Mountain College followed two years in art history at Radcliffe. All of my subsequent work was in painting and drawing, and I certainly thought of myself and exhibited as a 'painter'. I use quotation marks to emphasize, in advance, a later temporary concern with labels 'art' and 'craft'.

In the mid-70s crow-quill pen juxtaposed with sweeping washes on paper were my vehicle. The work was concerned with abstracted studies of sky, done in wash along with a horizontal band of intense black ... done with dense and intricate line, in pen.

I had been taught embroidery as a child. It had left my mind, and had been put in a pigeonhole outside of myself, neatly labeled 'for guest towels, table-cloths, and polite ladies'. But during the wash-and-pen period, [when I wasn't working] I began to do embroidery to entertain myself.

What happened soon became an obsession, and I stopped painting. If one dramatically enlarged a stitch, it could cast a shadow! What if one repeated a stitch and used it to entrap a raised surface? If one juxtaposed huge and small, rough and smooth, full space and empty space, then scale itself could be explored in a way I'd never discovered in painting, and could do what Mildred Constantine in her catalogue introduction for this exhibition calls 'the monumental in small scale'.

So I began. The first transmutation in thread, as against previous works, was that the wash skies, although Baroque, had been subtle and airy. In thread, because of its incredible richness, I wasn't interested in making airy space, but an almost claustrophobic denseness concentrated in part of the rectangle, with a spare surface on which it could float. And as for Baroque, it became my middle name.

I experimented with enlarged stitches, and with manipulating the thread in what I considered to be unique and exciting ways, only to discover at the Victoria and Albert [Museum] that my invention had been developed at least 400 years ago in Yugoslavia. Which told me the most moving thing of all, namely that there is a majestic simplicity and sparseness in the fact that a sharp object with a hole in it pulling a piece of string through cloth, has exquisitely endless limits.

However: with my new medium came a worry, which, sad to say, is cultural. The hierarchical madness of art versus craft affected me for a little while, once I found myself deeply committed to my new bed-fellow whom some would think had come from the wrong side of the tracks. But on seeing, at just the right moment, an overwhelming exhibition of early French tapestry at The Metropolitan [Museum of Art], I left it knowing that no hierarchy exists. Bronze isn't oil, but we call it sculpture, not craft. Thread isn't ink or oil, and only an idiot would denigrate it.

Later, after having gone all-out with my love of richness and density in what Rudyard Kipling in The Just-So Stories calls 'more than Oriental splendor', I began to lean towards the somewhat spare, and to a palette of ivories and greys, in the Albersian belief that within strictly set limits, a more muted but equally powerful territory can be explored. The earlier richness was simmered down, and Bernini rested.

I also realized how much like drawing certain stitches can become, and that it would be interesting to combine the wet of ink and brush, with the dry of thread, and that there would be a certain visual irony in portraying cloth with thread. Drapery became, and is still, my chosen image.
